The soundabsorbing furnishings, now in great demand for the control of the acoustic quality of environments, are mainly based on the use of fibrous and textile materials, whose production can be fed by textile waste, rather than by other raw materials, in order to obtain products with high sustainability and low impact in terms of climate-altering gas emissions and resource consumption. These last aspects will be studied using consolidated methods of LCA analysis. In addition, research* will have to focus on the use of digital technologies to support the supply chain to create products that can combine local specificities, traditionally linked to artisanal production, with high performance requirements..”.
